

Response to the Grocery Store Draft

My take on the situation is that larger grocery companies are abusing the smaller ones which allows the larger groceries to basically neuter the competition and set their products to whatever price they want without fear of their consumers moving to a different store to do their shopping. Not to mention, it sounds like some larger groceries are using smaller groceries as suppliers and using them as a scapegoat if things go wrong effectively reducing any backlash they may receive. It sounds like smaller groceries need better access to produce that they'll be able to buy at a fair price and sell to their consumers. I don't have anything to add to the already mentioned recommended actions that have been proposed.
